Dayton, O., possesses many points of attraction which interest and please the visitor. The National Soldiers' Home, with its beautiful grounds and war-scarred veterans full of reminicence and of tales of valor; the Parthenon-shaped County Court House, the Cooper Academy, the Orphan Asylum, the Lunatic Asylum and the Market House are all public institutions well worth seeing, and of the private residences, many are extremely handsome and striking. Dayton owes its importance, however, very largely to its numerous and varied manufactures, which give employment to many intelligent mechanics. One of these large establishments is the Buckeye Brass and Iron Works, which is well known for the excellence of its products. Among its emexcellence of its products. Among its em-ployees is John R. Rea, a patternmaker, whose home is at No. 127 Jones street. Mr. Rea speaks thus of his long standing

Mr. Rea speaks thus of his long standing trouble with neuralgia:

"That Athlophoros is the medicine for neuralgia and rheumatism. It rid me of my pain so quickly that I could scarcely realize that it was gone. But it was, and I must give Athlophoros the credit of doing what is claimed for it. I was an extreme sufferer for four years from neuralgia, the disease, of course, being worse at some times than at others. It was no common headache, but the kind of neuralgia that confined me to my house and many times to my bed. Last fall I had a very severe attack, which lasted about six weeks. I was entirely helpless and was not able to get out of the house at all. I did everything and used every remedy I had used

The Arkansas Travelers.

as they did that night and that the breakfast the next morning was the best they had ever eaten. After breakfast they thanked Mr. H. for his kindness and took their leave, notwithstanding it was Sunday morning. Soon after starting, Bob told Alec that he would move that his father send the paper to Mr. H., free of charge, in return for his favor. Alec seconded the motion and it was carried without a dissenting vote, so that the only thing necessary to carry the said motion was Mr. Hardy's consent; but whether it was given I am unable to state.

That day the boys forded two or three good sized streams, crossed Ozark and ennsylvania prairies and about sunset, arrived in a mile or so of Greenfield. As they had some provisions left, they stopped, built a fire, made coffee and baked chair last johnny cakes. Perhaps that last supper was enjoyed as much as any they had eaten since leaving home. It would soon be dark and therefore they started on and wended their way into Greenfield. There were still some boys on the street and as they recognized our "Arkansaw travalers" they sent up three cheers for them. Then came the vexing questions, "Say, kids, how many scalps did you get? How many 'bar' hides did you take? How is Barry county for deer? What did big Indian say to little white papoose?' To which last question some mischievous boy in the crowd grunted out "Ugh! him better hunt him mammee."

Our three travelers, to escape this tornado of unpleasunt questions, quietly eparated, and dodging down alleys and cutting across commons, were soon at the thresholds of their respective parental mansions. Here we will leave at east two of them, hoping that they are wiser if not better boys. Alec, the third one, whom some one may say is the hero of this story, is a better as well as wiser boy. I verily believe that the same divine hand that saved him from a watery grave, that bleak March day, has guided and directed his course in bring ng him out here to the Buckeye State to be educated in this Christian college He is my right-hand man at the table but he is not the same boy who sat there pefore the holidays, for during that time ne gave his heart to Jesus. He told me he other day that he had given his olks a "racket" about wanting to make doctor out of him and hinted that instead of being a physician for the body nake an intelligent Christian man.

Now, boys, in conclusion let us see what we have leaaned from this narraive. In the first place I think we can all see and will all agree, that we should not spend our time and money in read-we had better stay there until we are of age, or till we get the consent of our parents to leave? I think so. I believe here comes a time in almost every boy's life, when he feels that home is a cage and wants to go out into the world. At east, it was so with myself and I doubt not that I had as good a home, as kind a father and as loving a mother as the werage Highland boy.

I imagine I hear some boysay, "You run off to kill bears and Indians?" No, t wasn't for that I thought of going. My mind never ran much in that line. I always took more to "books and larnn." although never remarkable in this. But it was due to this that such a thought entered my cranium. I wanted to go away from home to school a year before father thought I was ready and when he refused his consent, I began to think of going anyhow. I first took an inventory of the notes I had in hand and to this added the highest cash value that I thought my colt, calf, sheep and hog vould bring if forced on the market. All the while those air castles, the deluion of every boy in such circumstances, danced before my mind. I could easily see myself coming home with an M. A., B. A. or, perchance, a L. L. D. appended to my name and being welcomed by

In laying down the pen, if this story has not proved uninteresting to its many readers and if it has influenced any one in giving up reading trashy literature, or don't want us to start up a competition has been the instrument in God's hands with the Police Gazette, do you? The of making any boy think more of home and loving father and mother, I shall trash like that. Their broad sashes, or obis, confining the folds of the loose dresses at the waist, were the most gorgeous of the rich old gold brocades; folds of contrasting crape were laid in the pointed neck of their kinnous, and the glossy blue-black hair was dressed in elaborate puffs and loops, held by twists of bright crape and thrust full of silver hairpins. They carried fans of gilt paper painted with maple leaves, and to the music of the samisen, and the plaintive voices of the musicians a B. A. or, perchance, a L. L. D. appended by both father and mother. Then too, I remembered of some boys who had taken the step I was contemplating and had done well, as I thought. Boys, let me say right here that they are few and far between, perhaps one success to methen, that the successes were plenty, and one, in particular, of which I had heard, impressed me the most. This was of a poor boy who, although not searchly running off, went off from home, with but one suit of clothes and a poor one at that and $5.12\frac{1}{2}$ in cash, if I miss take not. I considered that he did well, as he went to work, made a school teach; or one of himself, afterwards regained the esteem of his father if, indeed, he serve lost it, acquired a considerable amount of property and, to cap the climax, gained some local celebrity as an author under the nom de plume of "Pay's Second Son" but which was afterwaste changed to "Brutu." It was natural for me to ask myself if I could not do equally well. I was vain enough to be eddest son and sus I cut weeds in the cornfield that sultry August day I sollioquised thusly: In England the eldest son has the best stuff in him of any, his baby brother not excepted. An Adventure With a Tiger.

One afternoon, as I was returning from the forest with my men, who had een felling trees, walking in line one been felling trees, walking in line one behind the other, as is their custom, a tiger suddenly slipped from the jungle bordering the road, and in a moment struck down a youth a few yards before me. I dared not fire for fear of strik-ing the youth, but his father, who was me. I dared not fire for fear of striking the youth; but his father, who was walking just in front of him, armed with a spear, dashed on it and gave it a right willing thrust, which, with the threatening group, made it quit its hold, when it sprang into the thick jungle. It was all the work of a moment; the stroke of its paw did not seem to be tremendous, but the claws of the brute had penetrated so deeply into the chest and shoulder of the youth that he survived scarcely a quarter of an hour survived scarcely a quarter of an hour after being carried into the village.

As expected, the tiger attempted to scrape up the body the night after its burial. Next night, and for several others, I watched the grave, but the tiger did not keep tryst with me; but when I was not there it never failed to come. I therefore assisted them to construct a soare to catch it on its first return. A fence was made at all such places as there was a possibility of approach to the grave, leaving on the clear road a very conspicuous open gate, across which a thin cord was loosely drawn, connected with a green bamboo some thirty feet long, bent by the strength of several men into a bow, at whose extremity a sharp spear was so arranged as to be shot athwart the entrance gate on the release of the bamboo by the tiger pressing with his breast on the twig-like cord in his way. Every night for six days the trap was reset without the tiger's appearance. The seventh it was left unset, as apparently useless; next morning it was found that the tiger had been within the inclosure, and I saw it faithfully set in the evening. The following morning I was awakened by a great chattering outside the Balai, and, starting up to learn the cause of the uproar, I was informed that the trap had shot in the night, and the spear had been broken off, but the tiger had not been found. I was soon among the eager crowd who had armed to beat the woods. It was evident from the blood on the spear-shaft that it was sorely wounded, and could not be far off. We had little need, however, of gun or spear, for some thirty yards in the forest we found the warm body of the feline. Transitized from side to side, it had cleared the high fence with one gigantic bound, and had fallen dead where it lay.—Henry Forbes. construct a snare to catch it on its first return.
